The Nordic countries have roughly 27 million people altogether, and the Nordic countries together, is the world's 12th largest economy.

Nordic countries are modern and innovative economies with a highly educated population. These conditions have allowed Nordic companies to prosper in international business, innovation and cutting-edge technologies, sustainable development and sustainable management of resources.

The Nordic countries and the United States have much in common. We all share the fundamental values of democracy, human rights, and the rule of law. We strive toward societies based on non-discrimination, equality and inclusion, regardless of ethnicity, sexual orientation or religious background.

Nordic ties with the United States are strong and profound. Millions of Americans claim Nordic ancestry. A Nordic footprint can be seen especially in some of the northern states of the U.S. Thousands of Nordic companies — and companies with a substantial Nordic ownership — employ several hundred thousands of Americans. Nordic investments in the U.S. are counted in billions of dollars. The United States, has a considerable impact on the economies of the Nordics.

The Nordic countries have taken global leadership in gender equality. They were among the first in the world to grant women the right to vote. Women's influence in politics and social development has been very significant ever since. The prosperity of the Nordic region owes much to long-term investments in their people, through healthcare, education and parental support. This insurance makes Nordic countries and people stronger and less vulnerable as societies, but it also makes economic sense. Giving all an equal chance to take part in the workforce is profitable to the society as a whole.

The United States and NATO have for decades had a central role in maintaining and enhancing security in Europe. This is highly valued by the Nordic countries. Denmark, Iceland, Norway and the United States are members of NATO, whereas Finland and Sweden are close partners of the organization. Cooperation is comprehensive. Conflict prevention and resolution, international crisis management, disarmament, non-proliferation and the fight against terrorism are prime examples of widely beneficial cooperation in the field of security. As a whole, the Nordics are strong contributors to international security. They share the burden not only in their own region, but also globally.

USA-Nordic relations matter today more than ever. Times are exceptional in Europe and globally. We look forward to bringing together the business, government, community, and non-profit leaders, to share and learn from each other. We need to continue our active and close transatlantic dialogue on a wide range of issues.
